Teaser	Co-payments for medicines, remedies and applications may not exceed two percent of the annual gross income.
Volltext	For medications, remedies and applications that are prescribed, co-payments must be made. However, those with health insurance do not have to pay more than two percent of their annual gross income. For chronically ill people, the load limit is one percent of the annual gross income. Gross income includes all income with which insured persons finance their livelihood - for example: • Salary • pensions or pensions, • Interest on capital • Rental income When calculating the load limit, the annual gross income of all members living in the household is taken into account. These can be spouses, life partners under the Civil Partnership Act or children with family insurance. For families, the burden limit is reduced by the child allowances and, if necessary, the allowance for the spouse.

Modul	Sachverhalt
	In the case of recipients of social assistance, the standard rate of the head of household is used as the basis for calculating the load limit, which is why the allowances cannot be estimated. Children and adolescents up to the age of 18 are generally exempt from co-payments. Exception: Co-payment for travel expenses.
