Depending on the country you come from, a visa may be required for entry into Germany. You can find out which countries are subject to this requirement by consulting the "List of countries subject to visa requirements" published by the Federal Foreign Office.

Note: If you are already in possession of a residence title that is still valid, you do not need a visa to enter Germany.

When issuing a visa, a distinction is made between two cases:

Transit and short stays

If you are only passing through the Schengen area by air or land, i.e. you are on your way to a so-called third country (which is not itself a Schengen country), you must apply for a Schengen visa of category "A" or "C".

For a short stay of up to 90 days within a period of 180 days, a Schengen visa category "C" can be considered if gainful employment is not intended. This visa also entitles the holder to short stays in the other member states of the Schengen Agreement.

Longer-term stays

Longer-term stays (e.g. for the purpose of gainful employment or for the purpose of family reunification) require a national visa for foreign nationals who are subject to visa requirements.

The issuance is governed by the regulations for the

- Residence permit,
- the EU Blue Card
- the ICT card,
- the Mobile ICT Card,
- the settlement permit and
- the Permit for Permanent Residence - EU

and partly requires the approval of the foreigners authority at the intended place of residence.

After entry with a national visa, the corresponding permit is issued upon application for a specific legal purpose of residence. In special cases (for example in the case of highly qualified persons), a (permanent) settlement permit can also be granted immediately.

The permit must be applied for at the Foreigners' Registration Office before the visa expires.

For EU citizens and nationals of the EEA states Iceland, Norway and Liechtenstein, no visa is required for entry and no residence permit is required for residence. In principle, this also applies to Swiss nationals.

Erforderliche Unterlagen

In order to avoid time-consuming additional demands, you should contact the diplomatic mission or consular post in good time before the start of your journey and find out about the documents you need to submit.
