Teaser	As a matter of principle, doctors must maintain confidentiality about all data and documents that have been entrusted to them or become known to them in their capacity as doctors. Your doctor may only disclose your personal patient data to third parties if it is necessary to view the documents due to legal provisions or for a special justification or if you have given your express or presumed consent.
Volltext	As a matter of principle, doctors must maintain confidentiality about all data and documents that have been entrusted to them or become known to them in their capacity as doctors. Your doctor may only disclose your personal patient data to third parties if it is necessary to view the documents due to legal provisions or for a special justification or if you have given your express or presumed consent. The prerequisite for consent is that you release your doctor from the duty of confidentiality beforehand.
