Volltext	If you have two or more flats in Germany, you must declare to the registration office which of these flats is your main residence. The others are then automatically your secondary residences. A person can only ever have one main residence. Determining your main residence has important consequences, for example, the jurisdiction of many authorities is based on your main residence and you exercise your right to vote there. Your main residence is the home you use most often, i.e. the one where you spend most of your time. If you are married and do not live permanently separated from your family, this is the family's predominantly used home. The same applies to registered civil partnerships. Minors have their main residence in the home predominantly used by the person with custody. If the persons with custody live separately, the home predominantly used by one of the persons with custody is the minor's main home. You must notify the relevant registration authority of any change of main residence - however, this does not necessarily have to involve a move. In the case of a move, this notification is made together with the re-registration.
