Teaser	If you suspect that a statutory social insurance institution responsible for you has made an incorrect legal decision, you can lodge a complaint with its competent supervisory authority.
Volltext	If you do not agree with the decision of a statutory social insurance institution that is responsible for you or suspect an error in its administrative actions, you can submit a complaint to the supervisory authority responsible for this social insurance institution. Social insurance institutions for statutory health, long-term care, accident or pension insurance are state-independent if their area of responsibility does not extend beyond the territory of a federal state. On the basis of the complaint, the supervisory authority checks whether the social insurance institution in question is complying with the law and other legislation applicable to it. The supervisory authority can request all necessary documents from the social insurance institution and examine them for legal violations. If a violation of the law is found, the supervisory authority can work to ensure that this is rectified by the social insurance institution. You will receive a letter from the supervisory authority about the result of the investigation. However, the supervisory authority cannot make any decisions in place of the social insurance institution. The supervisory authority will inform you of the result of the audit in a letter.
