	§ 53 et seq. Vocational Training Act (BBiG) https://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/bbig_2005/_53.html
Teaser	After an initial professional qualification, you can acquire another nationwide recognized professional qualification by taking part in a further training examination.
Volltext	With a further training examination, you can, for example, obtain a qualification as an industrial foreman, business administrator, business economist or a bachelor / master professional. In order to be able to take part in a further training examination, you must have an initial professional qualification. This is, for example, completed vocational training. Depending on the degree you are seeking, you may need to meet additional admission requirements and/or have work experience. The office responsible for the degree you are aiming for will be happy to advise you on the respective requirements. You should prepare well for the content of the respective advanced training examination. There are, for example, courses from private providers and materials for self-study. However, this is not a legal requirement for admission to the examination. Depending on the profession and federal state, different bodies are responsible for conducting the examination. These are usually the chambers of industry and commerce, professional chambers or other bodies responsible for vocational training. The regional office responsible for you will inform you about examination options in your region. If the further training examination is not carried out at your location, you will find out where you can turn to as an alternative. The further training examination is conducted and evaluated by an honorary examination board. Continuing education exams consist of several exams that you have to take on different exam dates as a written knowledge test and as a practical or oral exam.
