Teaser	For certain construction projects you can apply for approval using a simplified procedure.
Volltext	For the construction, Change (e.g. conversion), Change of use (for example, conversion of a shop into an apartment) and the demolition of buildings and other structures You usually need a building permit. When applying for a building permit, you can choose between the simplified procedure and the concentrated procedure. In the simplified procedure, the responsible authority only checks compliance with some of the building regulations. Therefore, the simplified procedure is the quickest and most cost-effective way to obtain your building permit. However, as the builder, you must still comply with all public law regulations that specify how, where and what you can build - but this is the responsibility of your draftsman (your person authorized to submit building plans). The simplified procedure is mainly used for housing construction matters and is limited to certain projects.
Erforderliche Unterlagen	The specific documents depend on the individual case. Depending on the project, different documents will be required from you. Please ask the responsible authority which documents you need to submit for your specific construction project. The following documents may be required, among others: Extract

Hinweise	A complete building application is an essential prerequisite for the smooth running of the procedure. An application may only be submitted by a person authorized to submit building plans, usually an architect or a civil engineer. Bear in mind that you may still need permits from other authorities in the simplified procedure. You must check for yourself whether all legal areas of the building regulations and ancillary building law are complied with. If you would rather have everything from a single source, you should choose the concentrated procedure. If there are doubts about the basic approval of the building project, you can have these clarified at an early stage with a preliminary building permit. However, this only answers individual questions and does not replace the required building permit. Your building application may be rejected if the documents are not complete after repeated requests. Kurztext

Apply for approval for the construction, modification, change of use and removal of facilities using a simplified procedure Construction, modification, change of use and demolition of buildings requires a building permit. Two application options: simplified procedure concentrated process. Simplified procedure: Fastest and most cost-effective procedure for obtaining building permits, limited to the projects specified under Section 61 HBauO. In the simplified procedure, the responsible authority only checks compliance with some of the building regulations, but the builder must still comply with all regulations. Mainly used in residential construction projects.
